YOUNG MEN ENTER THE MUNICIPAL DISCUSSION.

But our party organizations are never educative forces. They run with the tide of popular sentiment; they never pause to ask the question, "Is it right?" Leaders of the party machine never take up an issue, unless they think they can win a majority through such issue. They do not follow Henry Clay's principle: "I would rather be right than be President." The offices are the objective point of party activity. In Great Britain, as well as in our own nation, great political reforms have resulted from the campaigns of education, in which clubs, independent or party organizations, have conducted at different periods.

Non-Partisanship Ineffective.

I believe however, that, here and in this our formative period, these clubs, in order to be most effective, should be partisan organizations. I have never been a hide-bound, knuckle-drum partisan; but the result of my experience is, that non-partisan organizations are short-lived and ineffective. They are spasmodic and inconclusive, non-institutional and constructive. In times of great public excitement, arising out of some extraordinary official malfeasance, some reckless abuse of power, or shameless corruption; and when all the large party organizations blindly miscalculate or ignore public sentiment, non-partisan movements succeed for a time, as in the election of Mayor Strong in New York, and Mayor Schieren in Brooklyn. But even in New England towns where the highest percentage of intelligent and independent character is found among the electorate, it is impossible to carry on non-partisan municipal organizations. It may be a perfectly correct ideal way of managing the affairs of a city; but nowhere in any American cities has it ever succeeded, because as Washington says, the party spirit unfortunately is inseparable from our nature.

At certain eventful periods in municipalities, citizens organize non-partisan clubs, because they feel that the party have fallen under the control of corrupt leaders. But they have themselves to blame for the degeneracy of their party organizations. They rail against the "Boss," but they are too blind to see that he is the creature of their own inactivity. Everywhere under our form of government, there is provided the local meeting for the election of delegates to nominating conventions, or the primary election, at which citizens vote direct for the persons whom they wish to represent them, either in nominating conventions, or on party tickets. If, instead of remaining at home, and leaving the field to the "Boss," men of character and intelligence would go into their neighborhood meetings, or attend their primaries, they would make themselves felt; they would elect as delegates to nominating conventions reliable and patriotic men; they would nominate for offices men whose character and capacity would stand as a guarantee that the government would be honestly administered. For after all, what Pope says is true: "For forms of government let fools contest; What's best administered is best."

If one half the energy and wisdom which was used in the effort to elect Seth Low, had been expended within the party, the probabilities are that that master of municipal science would now be Mayor of Greater New York.

Clubs As Aids.

Instead of making independent nominations, municipal leagues can aid party organizations by agitating those social and economic questions, upon which people must be educated, before they can be made political issues. But an objection may be raised here, that there are no political questions that enter into the government of a municipality. It is a common thing to hear men say, that the municipal corporation is a mere business concern, requiring good business men for its management. While all men agree, that the affairs of a municipality should be managed on business principles, yet it must be admitted that there are many municipal questions causing wide differences of opinion, upon which it is necessary to educate the electorate. Among them are such questions as these: Limited, or unlimited public franchises; municipal ownership and control of street railways; street cleaning; street lighting; removal of garbage; sterilization of milk as a sanitary precaution; material for sanitary streets and pavements; filtration of water; the licensing of department stores; prohibition of liquor traffic; high license, or local option. Such questions can well be agitated by clubs outside of party organizations, and by educating the people upon them, these clubs prepare the way for the introduction of such questions into the party platforms.

Rouse Young Men.

In many other ways can municipal clubs aid party organizations. As for example, in compelling officers after their election to do their whole duty, proceeding in the courts against them in the event of corruption or in the event of any revolutionary action, either in the exercise of official power, or in the expenditure of public money. These leagues through the press, by public meetings, and in other ways can help materially to secure the nomination of good men for public office, and after their nomination, they can aid the party organizations in various ways to elect them. But more than all, and above all, these leagues can aid party organizations by arousing the young men to activity; and this young men's research club can lead the movement. These clubs can be like so many training schools, from which young men can graduate into party leadership and management. This is the keynote to party success. Everywhere those political organizations are strong, whose young men keep on the firing line. Alexander, the conqueror of the world, led an invincible army. His standard was: "Come from conquest to conquest by the best soldiery of the age." The explanation of his prowess and success lies in the fact, that wives made the tent their home, bore children to their soldier husbands, and reared them in the midst of war. Born and bred warriors, they took to fighting like ducks to water and placed a wreath of immortality upon the brow of their chieftain. A healthy and hopeful sign always appears in the political sky, when young men, even before attaining their majority, take an active interest in public affairs, devote a reasonable part of their time and energy to public duty, and actively strive to promote the best measures and to elect to office the best men.

Cannot Ignore Party.

It is a mistake, gentlemen, to think we can ignore politics or party in the management of either our municipal or territorial affairs. Let us not forget, that from now on, we shall enter upon our career towards Statehood. Our entrance into the sisterhood of States will depend upon our growth in political philosophy, political science, and political management; it will depend upon our ability to conduct honest and efficient territorial and municipal governments upon broad gauge principles. Remembering this, every citizen will be a true patriot, who does his whole duty towards establishing here what but typical American called, "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people."
